You versus your Trust

It is common from a layman's perspective to not appreciate the relevance of treating separate legal entities as separate. Where expenditure is incurred to derive income, it is typically deductible for income tax purposes to the person that derived the income.

Documentary evidence should be held that reflects this connection to ensure the expenditure comprises an allowable deduction. The High Court recently considered this issue in the decision of Wong v Commissioner of Inland Revenue (2018).

In Wong v CIR, the taxpayer was an accountant by profession. He derived income from a consultancy business and two rental properties. He was also trustee of his family trust that derived rental income from a third property. Mr Wong financed both the consultancy business and rental properties through a number of loans and credit facilities in his personal name.

Despite reminders from Inland Revenue (IRD), Mr Wong failed to file personal income tax returns for the 2013 and 2014 tax years and IRD raised default assessments for those years of $84,273.10 and $39,549.65, including penalties.

Mr Wong disputed the assessments, contending that the correct tax position was $951 in 2013 and nil in 2014, on the basis that interest deductions were available in respect of all three rental properties. IRD argued that interest was only deductible in respect of the two properties owned personally. However, the interest incurred for the trust property could not be deducted against his personal income as it had been incurred by the Trust, as owner of the property. To successfully challenge IRD's assessments in the courts, the onus of proof rests with the taxpayer to show how, and by how much, the IRD's assessments are wrong. With respect to the interest incurred in relation to the trust property, the TRA found in favour of IRD, emphasising that Mr Wong had failed to prove the outstanding debt and interest was paid in relation to properties owned by him personally.

The taxpayer appealed to the High Court, who found the TRA's decision correct in all respects.

A shortfall penalty, for taking a 'grossly careless tax position' was also upheld. Mr Wong contended that no shortfall penalty should apply once tax losses are taken into account i.e., no cash tax liability existed due to his personal tax losses. However, shortfall penalties are calculated based on the net shortfall, as though tax is payable and the shortfall penalty was upheld.

From a commercial perspective, it can make sense to stand back and look at a group of entities as though they are a single person, especially when they are economically owned by a single person, however, IRD and the Courts do not take the same approach.

GST and land sales

In 2011 the GST Act was amended to prescribe that a supply of land between two GST registered parties was subject to a rate of 0% if the land was to be used by the purchaser to make taxable supplies and not as a principal place of residence.

Given the change reduced the GST rate to 0% it is fair to assume it should have simplified how GST applies, i.e. there wouldn't be any. However, in practice the change continues to cause problems both from a contractual and technical perspective. This led to Inland Revenue (IRD) issuing additional guidance in 2017. However, problems persist. We have outlined two examples below.

Under the GST Act, a purchaser is required to notify the vendor of their circumstances so that the vendor can establish whether or not to zero-rate the sale. In practice, this occurs by completing Schedule 1 of the Auckland District Law Society (ADLS) Sale and Purchase (S&P) agreement. However, there are instances where the schedule is not completed at all, in which case there is no 'agreement' between the parties regarding how GST applies.

If a GST registered purchaser does not complete the schedule and a vendor mistakenly charges GST at 15% because they assume the purchaser is non-registered, the purchaser will understandably apply to IRD for a GST refund. If IRD review the transaction and determine it should have been zero-rated IRD will decline the refund. Instead, the purchaser will need to seek a refund from the vendor. The vendor will also need to apply for a refund (of the GST) from IRD, to fund the repayment to the purchaser.

Another scenario is where Schedule 1 of the S&P has not been completed at all and the vendor incorrectly zero-rates a sale on the assumption that the purchaser is GST registered etc. In this situation, GST will need to be paid, but there is currently uncertainty regarding who is liable. A provision exists that deems the purchaser to be liable if a transaction has been incorrectly zero-rated. However, it is unclear whether this provision applies in all situations or only when the vendor and purchaser agreed what the GST treatment should be, which is later found to be wrong. If the vendor is held liable and the price has been expressed in the S&P as "including GST", the vendor is worse off. If the purchaser is held liable and the S&P was "including GST", it becomes a question of whether the purchaser can seek a partial refund of the purchase price from the vendor to fund their GST liability.

It is extremely important to ensure the S&P is complete and correct. Costly mistakes can be avoided simply by following due process. If you are unsure, please ask your advisor.

When is a gift not a donation?

If an individual pays "...a monetary gift of $5 or more..." to a charity they are able to claim 1/3rd of it back from Inland Revenue (IRD). Prior to 1 April 2008, individuals could only claim donations of up to $1,890, i.e. a refund of $630. The coalition Government at the time removed this limit and increased the threshold to the amount of taxable income, to incentivise individuals to give charitably.

For the average New Zealander, limiting donation claims to the amount of a person's taxable income is of no consequence. However, some high net worth individuals make donations that exceed the amount of their taxable income, thereby entitling them to large refunds.

cash payment, provided that it was a gift of a specific sum and was not a chattel or property item. Judgement was upheld for Mrs Roberts.

For example, a large donation could be made to help fund an important capital project of a charity, such as the construction of a new building for the homeless. The question then becomes how to structure a large donation, to ensure a donation rebate can be claimed. The problem lies in the legislation itself. Although the regime is to incentivise charitable giving, the legislation can be narrow in scope. The donation claim is restricted to monetary gifts made in an income year, whilst assets, such as "food" donated to the homeless, does not qualify for the tax credit.

The High Court decision in Roberts v Commissioner of IR examined a donation rebate that was in the form of a loan forgiveness. Mrs Roberts had made a cash loan to a charity of $1.7m. The loan was subsequently being forgiven across multiple years and claimed as a donation rebate. IRD considered that a 'debt forgiveness' was not a charitable gift within the meaning of the current legislation because it was not a 'cash' gift. Judge Coleman decided in favour of Mrs Roberts and confirmed that a monetary gift did not require

The forgiveness approach is no different, for example, to Mrs Roberts making the loan and then making cash donations in future years that are used by the charity to repay her loan. In substance, cash has been paid by a private individual to a charity – being the purpose of the regime.

In a surprise move, when the Taxation (Annual rates for 2018-19, Modernising Tax Administration, and Remedial Matters) Bill was reported back from the Finance and Expenditure committee (FEC) on 18 January, IRD had included a recommendation that the current legislation be amended to prescribe that donations need to comprise a "gift of money", thereby legislating against the decision in Roberts. By recommending the change at such a late stage of the enactment process, it skips the public consultation phase. IRD have justified the change by asserting that the 2007 re-write of the Income Tax Act changed the meaning, and they are merely changing it back.

Rather than accepting IRD's view, it would be nice if the FEC had looked at the issue more 'charitably'.

Winding up a company

If a company does not file its annual return with the Companies Office, it may be struck off from the Companies Register. This is sometimes used as a 'short-cut' method, rather than completing the short-form company liquidation process.

However, this approach comes with some risks, for example, if a company is struck off the register whilst it has tax credits owed by Inland Revenue (IRD), the tax refund is effectively forfeited and will not be paid to the company nor its shareholder(s) unless the company is reinstated.

Similarly, if a struck off company is still named as the owner of land (on the title), the company has to be reinstated in order to transfer the land to its correct owners and then wound up again.

Although the process of winding up a company can be lengthy, to minimise risk for both the business and its stakeholders it is recommended that the correct procedure is followed.

The process should always be commenced with a special shareholders resolution, which provides legal evidence that the majority of shareholders agree to the wind-up. It represents the point from which capital gains may be distributed tax free and is a commonly requested by IRD if they happen to review the wind-up process.

Any outstanding company liabilities are then satisfied, including trade creditors and anything owed to related parties. Surplus assets are distributed to shareholders, ensuring any legal formalities are observed depending on the type of asset (e.g. updating the land registry for any land / buildings).

For tax purposes, distributions to shareholders may be non-taxable to the extent they are comprised of share capital or capital gains, however excess amounts may comprise taxable dividends to the shareholders.

The company should complete its final GST and income tax returns (etc.), pay any outstanding tax liabilities and then de-register with IRD. A request is also made to IRD to provide written approval for the company to be removed from the companies register.

With no assets or liabilities, the company bank account can be closed before the final stage of passing a further shareholders resolution resolving to make an application to the Companies Office to remove the company from the Companies register. The Companies Office gives public notice of its intention to strike the company off in the New Zealand Gazette. Provided no objections are received within 20 working days from the date of the notice, the company is struck off the register.

Although the process sounds prescriptive, incurring the cost of having it done correctly could save money in the long run.

GST on low value imported goods

GST is intended to be a broad-based tax applying to goods and services consumed in NZ, however under the current system not all goods and services are captured. Specifically, GST is not currently collected on imported goods worth $400 or less. Historically, it was thought that the administrative cost of collection would outweigh the tax revenue collected, however the import market has grown giving rise to increasing concern NZ suppliers are disadvantaged in comparison to offshore suppliers.

Following in the footsteps of recent Australian law changes, a Bill was introduced into Parliament in December 2018, the Taxation (Annual Rates for 2019-20, GST Offshore Supplier Registration, and Remedial Matters), that seeks to level the playing field.

The Bill, intended to be effective from 1 October 2019, proposes to apply GST to goods valued at $1,000 or less (excluding tobacco and alcohol) that are delivered to a NZ address from overseas. Offshore suppliers will be required to return NZ GST if their total supplies to NZ exceed $60,000 in a 12-month period.

So what does this mean for NZ consumers? They will likely have to pay GST on low-value goods imported from overseas, while NZ businesses are now on a more level playing field with their overseas competitors.

Post holiday blues

As the festive season becomes nothing more than a distant memory, those of us lucky enough to have enjoyed some time off have been hit with the reality of returning to work. If you find your employees are feeling a bit blue following the end of the holiday season, rest assured you are not

Sugar Taxes

With obesity becoming an ever increasing problem in New Zealand, there is regular debate regarding the effectiveness of a sugar tax to curb the problem. There is a lack of consensus on whether such a tax may be beneficial, yet sugar taxes are nothing new.

100 years ago in 1919, with the First World War nearing conclusion, politicians in the United States decided that taxing ice-cream sodas, sundaes, juices, lemonades and other sugary drinks would offset the tax revenue lost from alcohol sales once the nationwide prohibition came into effect.

However, one year after introduction of the sugar tax, following the conclusion of the war, the tax was scrapped. The USA still faced record levels of war debt, yet the soda tax was so unpopular with the American people that it wasn't a viable option.

Although the 1919 soda tax did not have health objectives in mind, it is reasonable to conclude that soda was not something the American people wanted their politicians messing with.

After 100 years, the situation in New Zealand is only getting worse with 32% of adults considered obese, what are our options? During the First World War, rationing was a way to ensure people got what they "needed"...

alone! Some employees may return to work more exhausted than ever as their bodies and minds struggle to adapt back to their normal routine.

Days of sleeping in and staying up late wreaks havoc on people's body clocks, leaving many feeling sluggish and tired once returning to work. Scientists have indicated that straying from your normal routine and sleep schedule can cause what has been termed 'social jet lag'.

Those suffering from social jet lag may experience symptoms such as difficulty concentrating, irritability, daytime sleepiness, reduced alertness and an overall feeling of being unwell. All of which may see productivity and motivation levels drop amongst employees.

Encouraging staff to reinstate their regular routine will help create normalcy and get everyone back into the rhythm of work. It is important that people try to include as many of their usual habits as possible to eliminate any holiday habits that may have crept in over the break. Experts say that the sooner people return to their regular routine, whether it be eating healthy meals or getting in an early morning workout, the more likely they are to be motivated to get back on track.

For many employees, their arrival back at work will likely begin with sifting through an overflowing inbox and scrambling to respond to each unread message. To avoid employees getting overwhelmed, suggest they filter their emails by subject or sender rather than in date order. This will allow them to focus their attention on what happened whilst they were away, instead of when things happened. Furthermore, perhaps try holding a meeting sometime soon after employees return to run through the tasks they were working on prior to the break. This will allow everyone to create a prioritised list of tasks to complete and help get productivity levels up as employees have a clear focus on what they should be working on.

While we should acknowledge that there will be an inevitable transition period for everyone getting back into the swing of things, it is important to encourage employees to get back on track as soon as possible. Have conversations that promote a positive attitude and help encourage employees to set goals and objectives that will help them regain motivation and settle into the rest of the working year.
